The tomato markets continue to trade at relatively engaging levels for buyers. The Florida tomato harvest has improved immensely during the winter from the Hurricane Irma damaged fields. Further, recent weather in Florida has been conducive for crop development. History suggests, however, that higher tomato prices could be forthcoming. The tomato (large-case) market has averaged higher in March from February in 9 of the last 10 years. Lettuce prices remain fairly appealing as well, but the downside risk is likely nominal.
